Bok Claims Divine Guidance In Dalton Denial

By Danathy Kritchell

Harvard University President Derek Bok '54 revealed last week to supporters and protesters alike that his decision to deny tenure to HLS Assistant Professor Clare Dalton, LL.M. '73, was inspired by what he described as a "voice from on high." In response to demands for an explanation by a group of rabid law students, Bok responded, "You're talking to the wrong person. It's not my decision."

One source close to Bok told reporters "this is not the first time [he] has relied on supernatural communications." According to this source, the last incident occurred during the spring of 1987 in connection with the tenure decision of David Trubek when Bok claimed his pet cat "Isis" communicated to him by refusing to eat her Little Friskies, an incident Bok said was "without precedent," according to the source.

According to another source, not quite as close to Bok as the first one but no stranger either, Bok lately has been seeking more guidance from above than "I can remember." The source also said he once saw Michael Jackson in a restaurant.

Another source reported observing Bok purchasing a Ouija board from the Harvard Square Toy Shop, and Hal Scott, who spoke on condition of anonymity, reported smelling incense, "or something like it," emanating from Bok's office on a "not really infrequent" basis.

Members of the Ad Hoc Committee appointed to review the Dalton decision were initially unwilling to respond to reporters, or to us, but when intimidated, Archibald Cox '37 admitted that Bok "never really paid much attention to my input. He never looked me in the eye, and always seemed to be looking a little over my head."

Another Committee member said, "you're hurting my arm." The member later said that the only time Bok discussed anything with them was at one point during the meeting when he feverishly asked everyone to join hands and chant.

Bok's recent revelations appear to have conciliated some of the previously hostile law school student body. In fact, a recent poll indicates that Bok has now overtaken Pat Robertson in the national primary caucuses. When pressed for comment, one student who was polled responded, "Bok? I thought you said Bork."

Other students are less enthusiastic about the recent developments. "This is just one more example of the administration's mainstream, traditional, dogmatic, hegemonic, closed-minded, reactionary, conservative, heretical, formalistic, oppressive, fatalistic, simplistic, and bad agenda. Do you think this ribbon goes with my backpack?"

Members of the faculty have been mixed in their reactions. David Ro-

Conservative Crushes Commie

By Slick Renault

Only six months after contra leader Adolfo Calero's address was cancelled, HLS suffered yet another violent blow to free speech on campus. This time, however, the tables were turned, with the disruption coming from the ranks of the ultraconservatives, as Danny Eaton, 2L, attacked the bust of Antonio Gramsci which had been displayed in Langdell library by the Critical Legal Studies Reading Group (CLSRG).

The CLSRG's plans had been plagued with problems from the outset. The group originally invited the controversial Italian communist Antonio Gramsci to speak on campus. These plans were later shelved when it was discovered that Gramsci had died in an Italian prison in the spring of 1937.

"It's premature to insinuate that HLS had anything to do with Gramsci's untimely demise," stated an unidentified member of the CLSRG; "however, such action would be consistent with Harvard's blatant anti-leftist policies," s/he said. The speaker refused to identify its gender for fear of reinforcing illegitimate sexual stereotypes.

As a result of this unforeseen complication, the organization was forced to settle for a bust of the late great thinker and an exhibition of his works and how they relate to the evolution of the modern "Reptile," which was to be displayed behind the internal elevator on the fourth floor of Langdell library.

Paralleling the uproar surrounding the restricted ticket sales to last October's cancelled Calero speech, the planned location of the Gramsci exhibit met with immediate hostility from the general student body.

"While Langdell may be an acceptable location for some students, there are many of us who choose to study elsewhere because we find it inconvenient or personally offensive to set foot into that columned tomb of legal history," commented an unidentified 3L.

"This means that the Gramsci exhibit is inaccessible to many HLS students and this amounts to blatant audience stacking with students who frequent the library to study or because it's a convenient location to sleep. In either case a less hostile audience is assured because only those too busy or tired to object will ever see the display," she added.

The controversy reached a fervent pitch during the exhibit's unveiling, which was met by fierce student opposition. A coalition of HLS Republicans and various presidential campaign supporters, all of whom attended a pre-protest rally where they received a stirring telelinked address from presidential candidate and evangelist Pat Robertson, showed up to denounce the "Red Presence" at HLS. The protestors, who were not admitted beyond the door of the library, carried placards

Kaplow Cracks Nature's Anti-Aging Mystery

By Ponce de Leon

Tax specialist, antitrust demigod and amateur chemist Louis Kaplow has announced that he has created the world's first successful eternal youth potion. The mixture, made from ingredients Kaplow refuses to divulge, is the secret to the youthful appearance of the professor, aged 90.

"I was just knocking around the lab one day, and I thought that this just might work," he explained. "I started testing it on Steve Shavell, and it worked. You'd never know he was 120 by looking at him!"

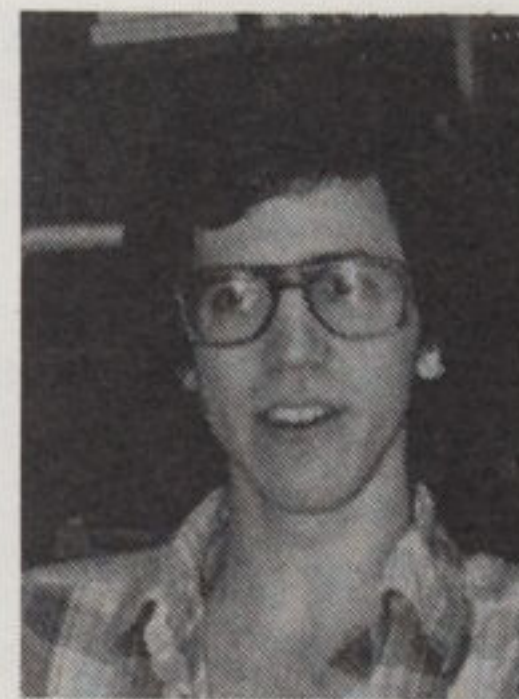

Also said to be regular users of Kaplow's magical mixture: David Wilkins (aged 107), Kathleen Sullivan (aged 88) and Abe Chayes (aged 463).

Kaplow admits he has had some setbacks getting other faculty members to try his invention.

"I offered some to Dougie (Ginsburg) once, but he replied 'Lou, just say NO to drugs!'" explained Kaplow.

Kaplow also noted that the drug has had some failures as well. "Occasionally it will invert the aging process and actually speed up the body's decay, not to mention the mind's," Kaplow said. While he refused to give specific examples, he did note that Arthur Miller is in reality only 22 years old. "I hate to think I created a monster," said Kaplow, "though some have taken

Kaplow, after

to calling me Frankenstein."

Other side effects described by Kaplow included talking uncontrollably fast, a low self-image, and looking like a geek. "Thankfully, none of these have affected me," he said, adding something unintelligible.

HLS Enters Its Deconstructive Phase

By Pagan Sins

In an attempt to answer the frenzied cries of certain HLS students regarding the need for greater emphasis on human rights and the development of third world countries in the curriculum, HLS has embarked on what Dean Jimbo Vorberg '51 described as a "good move in that direction" with the Program To Deconstruct The Campus. The deconstruction has been haphazardly planned by Sandinista Inc., a newly formed limited partnership.

With the recent unveiling of the Hark renovation plans at a Semi-Informal affair in the newly named "Upper Mess Hall," HLS has started anew. The plans were favorably received by the politically correct in attendance. One source who was not there, but whose roommate's Ames partner's Legal Method's instructor's wife's sister was, said, "There were lots of oohs and ahs."

Dean Sarah Wald, who attended the event fashionably attired in fatigues and, according to a friend of the person responsible for sharpening the pencils used to draw the plans, arrived with the Jimbo himself (clad in freshly starched fatigues and bow tie), smiled for the paparazzi, thinking they were no doubt there due to her recent cameo appearance with the HLS Drama Society.

The plans included drawings, material and paint samples, and a scaled down model of what the joint will look like when the dirty deed is done. "The best part about the whole plan is that it's cheap, cheap, cheap," the Misdirector of Facilities said. "We can cut costs by refusing to maintain the campus and its buildings and now we even have an excuse for doing it. And if we cut costs and go through with the Jim-meister's plan for that 7.9 percent tuition increase, we'll have more money to spend on important things."

A source close to the person serving coffee (out of tin cups) at the event said costs would be cut because both materials and labor would be cheap. The material includes paints in hues of green, brown, and black, which retain a relatively inexpensive cost in various retail paint stores due to lack of demand. As for workers, the administration plans to allow students to volunteer their time.

"You know those HLS students will volunteer for anything, it's an amazing freak of nature," one professor, who requested anonymity for fear of losing the sycophant student workers who volunteered to research and write his latest text, said. If, by some small miracle, more workers are needed, the children at the HLS Child Carefree Center will be put to work. "It's about time those kids realized life's not one big whining naptime," a RECORD staffer screamed.

The plans are already underway. The first step was the digging of a large foxhole outside of Shaw and Holmes Companies. The foxhole, strategically blocking any walkway, led to the creation of a large mud patch suitable for the proposed site of the soon-to-be-syndicated "CLS v. Derek Bok Saturday Morning Mud Wrestling Main Event." But one excited proponent of the new deconstruction plan said it did more than that. "It gave us a chance to get our boots muddy. You know. It looks more realistic."

The second step was the construction of a plank across the muddy fields in question. Now, students headed for the Hark from Everett Street have the added penalty

Phallic 'Tree' Must Be Clipped

Male dominance. Think of the images this phrase conjures. Last Thursday, in my weekly visit with my FEMALE psychiatrist, we played word association. She said, "male dominance." I said, "Harvard Law School."

It irks me to no end that the school which will confer my professional status upon me, the school admired by thousands of male and FEMALE law-types around the world, could be so steeped in the masculine tradition.

What is the ultimate symbol of this male orientation? Not the overwhelmingly male faculty, not the overwhelmingly male student body, not the overwhelmingly male maintenance staff, not the overwhelmingly male alumni association, not the overwhelmingly male names for campus buildings, not the overwhelmingly male portraits in classrooms and libraries, not the overwhelmingly male staff of the Harvard Law RECORD.

If you think the biggest problem is one of the above, then you're stupid. And more than likely male.

Because, clearly, the ultimate symbol of male dominance at Harvard Law School is the "World Tree." Yes, Virginia, that seemingly unassuming little sculpture in the lawn in front of Harkness Commons, supposedly symbolizing world harmony or some such white-male-radical-chic-sixties-hogwash, is really the most blatant sexual slur ever constructed (third only to the Washington Monument and the Eiffel Tower).

The World Tree, by my reckoning, is a giant, male-oriented phallic symbol, stretching to the skies to symbolize the limitless ambitions of Harvard Law School males.

Repulsive? You bet your stones! It just stands there, pointing upward, degrading any FEMALE that should pass, subjecting her to a thousand different sexual allusions, as she simply tries to traverse from her dormitory to the Hark.

What should be done about this travesty of gender neutrality? What steps can be taken to eradicate this staff of life of male chauvinism? Can we abide this public thrusting of male bravado? Are you getting hot? So am I.

I'm sure Dean Sarah Wald is, and the dean should get off her post-feminist duff and prod the male higher-ups to castrate this problem in the bud.

My solution? Either trash the "World Tree" and the horror it represents, or, to more fairly represent the student body, faculty, and community at-large, construct two "World Mounds" nearby.

I'm sorry, but this is my opinion. And you're sorrier if it's not yours.

Idle Chat

with Fenno

It is with great pride that I introduce my new column about the inside happenings here at HLS. Let me say right off the bat that I cannot accept responsibility for the veracity of these little tidbits. I never intended for everyone to read about them and I thought everyone knew about them already anyway.

After all, these are people I've come to know well in my many years at HLS, and I would never damage their credibility to my own advantage.

OVERHEARD: Last Friday night, at a party in Somerville, Professor Thomas Jackson, newly appointed dean of U.Va. Law School, was overheard using exclusively male pronouns in an entire series of party jokes. (While this shouldn't disqualify him for the deanship, perhaps U.Va. ought to look to other HLS faculty as possible replacement candidates.)

In a stunning revelation I overheard Rose Kennedy make to her son Teddy at a recent Boston party, the virile woman confided that she had (like her sons) been quite "active" in her early years and had spawned four hitherto unknown half-brothers: Duncan, Anthony, David and Randall. The four can be seen this summer in a remake of the movie Animal Crackers.

In another surprise geneological revelation, Dean Sarah Wald told her secretary, or so I hear, that the new dean of students is actually the illegitimate daughter of outgoing dean Mary Upton. "I don't know," said Upton, "I guess it's just in the genes to be sensitive to students' concerns and to appoint a committee as soon as possible." (While this shouldn't necessarily disqualify Wald as dean of students, maybe an interim dean from the HLS ranks should be appointed).

Not realizing I planned to print all these nasty things about her, Sarah Wald also told me that maintenance crews have discovered the source of the foul "pub stench" that resulted in periodic evacuation of the Hark this year. Sarah said that while they were mopping around the beer kegs, they discovered the decaying remains of the famous architect Walter Gropius.

The crews don't plan to remove the aromatic corpse, having found an attached note, with clear testamentary intent, requesting that his body be buried in the site of his greatest architectural triumph. When I asked her about her decision to leave his foul-smelling body behind the bar, Sarah said, "Most of the students who are complaining now will graduate soon. But I'm still sensitive to the issue, and we'll consider it in the Harkness renovation discussions."

On condition of anonymity, Harvard Big Shot Derek Bok told me he plans to overturn

Tribe Trounces All Other Teachers At Tournament

By A. Nony Mous

Faculty, alumni and students had a wild time in the First Annual Spring Festival and Frolic at HLS. The numerous events drew packed crowds to the Cambridge campus to gasp and cheer as faculty members and alums competed, sometimes even to the death, in numerous HLS-related events.

The highlight of the week showcased HLS professors demonstrating the skills that have allowed them to rise to the top of academia. In the "How to Avoid Students During Office Hours" competition, Laurence Tribe '66 blew away his competition by unveiling his unique Austin Hall wall scaling device. Tribe was able to avoid four 2Ls from his Constitutional Law class and two 3Ls from his First Amendment Rights seminar by climbing the steep brick facade of Austin and lying on the roof of the building until the students eventually gave up 5 hours later. "It wasn't that tough at all," said Tribe. "I do this all the time."

Runner-up was Professor Alan Dershowitz. Dersh avoided troublesome students by hiding in the rubble of his office, covering himself with copies of his numerous books, manuscripts, newspaper columns and legal briefs. However, one enterprising 1L was able to discover the disappearing prof by waving a pastrami in the air above Dersh's desk, causing Dersh to peep out from his mound of papers, where he was immediately cornered.

"It just goes to show you the power of a good pastrami," joked Dersh. "In fact, this is just the kind of tasty morsel my own deli, soon to open in Harvard Square, will be serving. We'll cater weddings, bar mitzvahs, Law Review parties. . ."

Other top professional stunts included Martha Minow's attempt to hide herself among the students at the HLS Child Care Center (where she was discovered exhorting the children to get in touch with their real inner feelings), Philip Areeda '54 posing as a counterman at the Three Aces, Charles Nesson '63 trying to pass as a woman to get a quick tenure denial, and Clare Dalton, LL.M.'73, trying to impersonate a tenured faculty member.

In a second crowd-pleasing event, CLS Jeopardy, Gerald Frug took top honors when runner-up Morton Horwitz '67 failed to phrase his response in question form. Quizmaster Roberto Unger, LL.M. '70, had presented the clue to the anxious contestants: "Sixteen Sleek White Feet." After Horwitz revealed his incorrect guess, "Duncan's boat," Unger unveiled Frug's winning question, "On what do the HLS cor-

Frug, who reviles social stratification, denied that he was "a winner" at all, but everyone stipulated to the fact before he could elaborate. Frug earns an automatic berth into the Tournament of Champions with his triumph, and said he expects similar success against the other qualifiers, none of whom speak recognizable English.

and chanted "Hey Hey Ho Ho, Laissez-Faire's the way to go."

The protest remained peaceful until Dean James Vorenberg '51 unveiled the bust, exposing its grotesque face to the angry rabble. Groans of disgust rose through the crowd and in a completely unexpected move one of the protestors (later identified as Eaton) rushed from the crowd and lunged at the throat of the unsuspecting bust.

Eaton, still screaming anti-communist epithets, was swiftly subdued by the ever alert Langdell reference staff and dragged off into the Root Room to await arrest. Gramsci's bust, while shaken, was unharmed. The event was immediately called to a premature completion to avoid any further risk of injury.

"This is a travesty for free speech at Harvard," noted one of Gramsci's sponsors. "Speakers from the political left just aren't safe here because the administration sympathizes with the conservative student body and refuses to provide adequate security," he said, adding that "none of the great 19th century communist intellectuals has spoken at HLS in the last few years. Something is fundamentally wrong when contras and deceased communists aren't safe at HLS," he added.

Vorenberg later issued a press release condemning Eaton's actions and promising to set up a committee to investigate the incident. When asked about the progress of the committee he set up in October in response to the Calero event, he assured reporters that he would form a committee to investigate their progress as well.

Eaton will be arraigned later this week on criminal charges of assault and battery, attempt to deface university property and entering the library without showing identification.

FBI Fascists Find Feisty Fugitive, Firearms

By Sam Dinista

FBI agents, in the culmination of a massive international manhunt, announced the arrest of fugitive assassin and terrorist Carlos "The Jackal" on the HLS campus this past Monday. Carlos, sought by numerous countries for multitudinous heinous crimes and other acts of international mischief, had been attending HLS by masquerading as a 2L under the alias "Bob Borque."

HLS professor and terrorism expert Philip Heymann '60 helped coordinate the dragnet that eventually cornered the sought-after villain. The search exhausted every cent of Heymann's foundation grant of $300,000 for the study of terrorism.

"We first became suspicious when this 'Borque' spent a summer in Nicaragua and returned to campus with 2 cartons of plastic explosives and a cache of small firearms. When asked to explain their purpose, he said they were part of his third year paper. That drew our attention - the guns were certainly nothing unusual, but the idea of a 2L or anyone else planning a third year paper before March of their last year seemed unbelievable," Heymann said.

The discovery of Carlos' masquerade surprised fellow students and faculty members, who never suspected that the mild-mannered

"Borque" was really a tool of the international terrorist conspiracy.

"He was just an ordinary guy like me," said an unidentified pipe-smoking 1L, heir apparent to the Joe Rzeppa Chair in the pub. "Sure, he had strange habits, like carrying a Kalishnokov rifle around with him at all times and keeping a list of every place that Pat Robertson went. But, hey, we've all got our quirks."

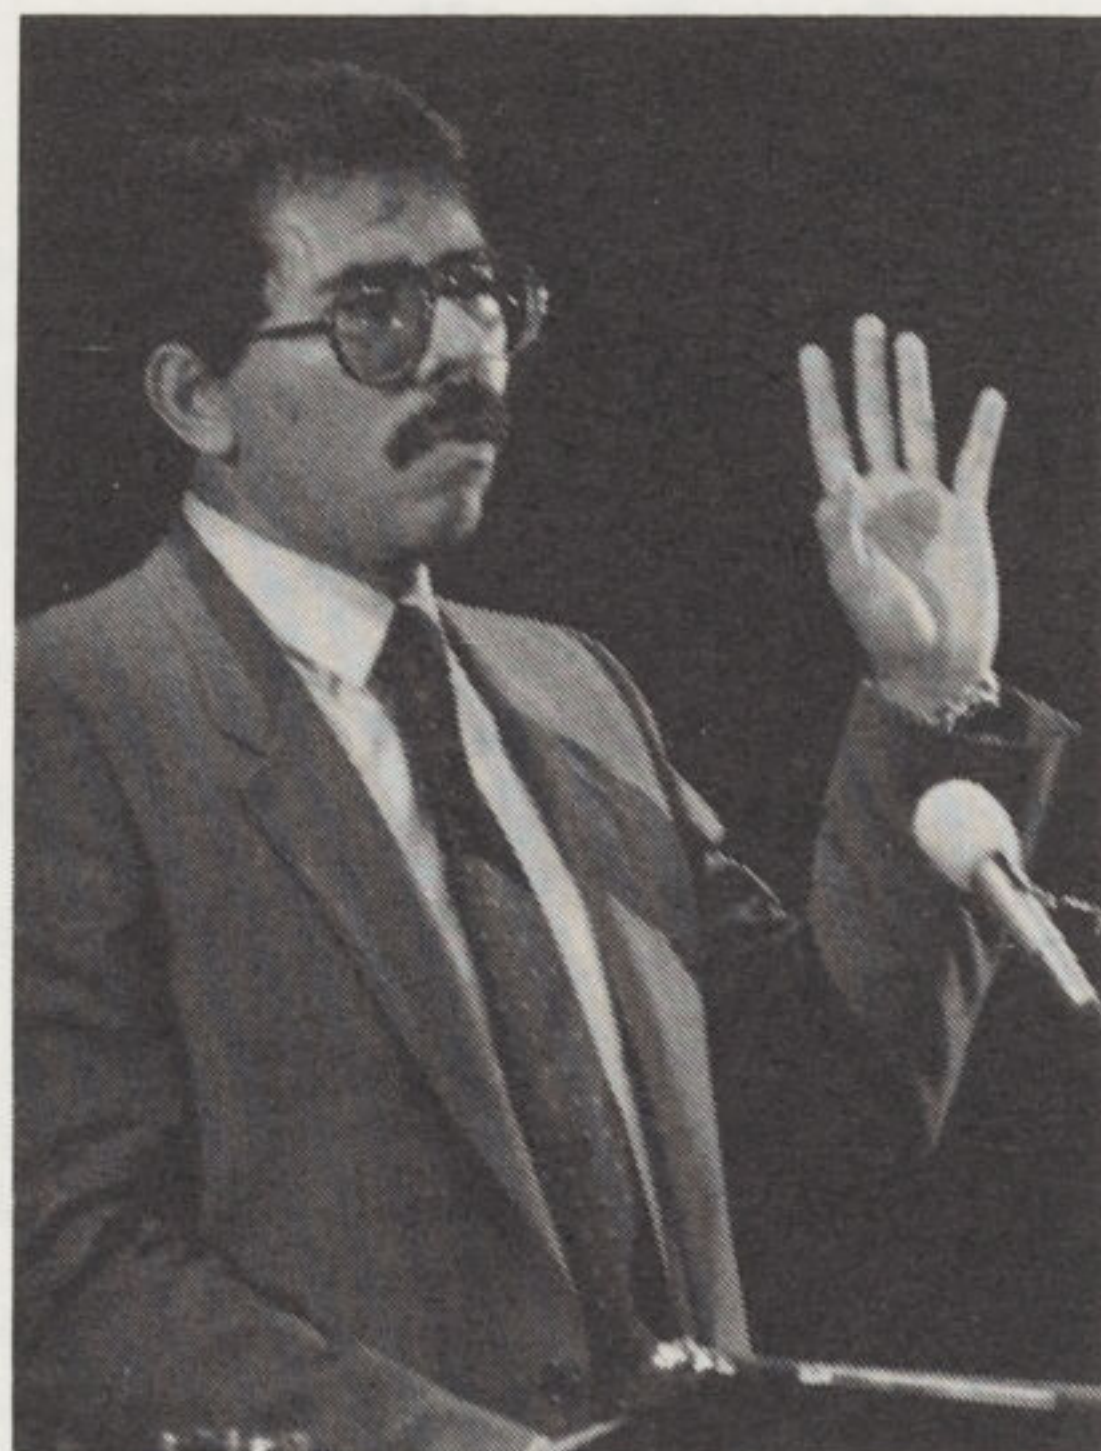

"He was a model student," said Charles Ogletree '78. "He always did his work, and I was amazed at his knowledge of international criminal law. Boy, this really fooled me."

The reputed Carlos declined to comment on this affair. However numerous world leaders took offense with the FBI action.

Daniel Ortega, Nicaraguan leader and friend of Borque, called the act a "moral outrage". Fidel Castro of Cuba said that this was "an affront to peaceful citizens everywhere." Meanwhile, HLS professors Duncan Kennedy and Alan Dershowitz have begun to prepare a trial defense.

"I'll defend anyone, even an alleged international criminal mastermind, as long as they frequent my deli, soon to be opened in Harvard Square," said Dershowitz, adding "We'll cater weddings, bar mitzvahs, Law Review parties,..."

Kennedy added "This case sounds like more fun than clogging up copy machines at Cravath or even putting up little colored pieces of paper with funny chf remarks on them!"

the results of the HLS Democrats straw poll on the presidential race because he feels George Bush is the only "qualified candidate." Derek said that teaching ability was not a consideration, and he had consulted with an independent evaluation committee before making his decision. "What a resume this guy has," Bok said.

My phonetap on Larry Tribe's office revealed . . . strike that . . . I would never listen in on his telephone conversations.

My distinguished friend Arthur Miller told me yesterday in complete confidence that he has signed on as the narrator in the upcoming campaign attack video to be produced by Susan Estrich. Miller will compare the striking similarities between current Democratic presidential candidates and famous European communist party leaders.

While I don't usually rat on students, I will mention that I hear Mike Mollerus, 3L, has organized a letter-writing campaign to congratulate Anthony Kennedy on his confirmation to the Supreme Court. Mollerus, who hasn't yet heard whether his clerkship with Kennedy will transfer to the high court, said, "He's just such a nice man, I think he deserves the congratulations regardless of what should happen to me."

of "walking the plank" to get to class (a task which some say is adequate punishment for attending HLS).

In addition, a rancid stench has been acquired for the Pub in order to provide students with a real taste of what living in places without plumbing can be like. One Pub tender clad in a green Miami U.

jacket was heard to praise the administration's efforts. "Wow, what a gas," he acclaimed.

"Yo!" Jimbo said in excitement. "You know this is only the beginning of the end." Sources close to the Dean's secretary say that the Jimster is happy because, for once, he can get all the C's off his back. "Both the chf and the CLS people should be ecstatic," the source said.

senberg, who did not graduate from Harvard Law School and thus does not get a little year symbol after his name, said "Bok's core theory is simply untenable. I'm the only one on this faculty who has communications with the Big Man, and He keeps no secrets from Me," he shrieked.

Dalton, who started this whole thing, was determined to continue the fight "until no one cares anymore." She said that her lawyer was trying to come up with a new tort to cover the recent developments, but "I just know there's something awry here. If the Almighty wanted to intervene, She certainly would have taken my side in this case."

Duncan Kennedy, who also didn't graduate from Harvard although some people wish he would, promised to retaliate. "This recent development doesn't alter my commitment to Clare's cause by two iotas," he said. "I happen to have a Friend of my own who has far more influence around here. He got me hired," Dunc said, glancing downward and carving a pentagram into his desk.
